Not illustrated. 1894 Excerpt: ...by its compressed stem; this is easily seen when the plant is fresh, but is lost when dried; also by its leaves only half clasping the stem (not wholly, and cordate, as in perfoliatus). Usually the nerves are much fewer than in perfoliatus; the early growth is also much like crispus in facies; but as in all hybrids, it varies much, sometimes inclining to one supposed parent, sometimes to the other. From P. crispus it may be known by the nearly entire leaves (the apex of which has minute persistent spines) not serrated as in crispus. Usually the mature upper leaves are much broader than generally is the case in crispus; but I have seen a specimen of true crispus with leaves nearly as broad as some of the undulatus forms. AMERICAN BIRD-VISITORS TO IRELAND. BY W. E-PRAEGER, KEOKUK, IOWA. VII.--The White Jer-Falcon (Falco islandus, A.O.U. Checklist; F. candicans, most authors). A Geance over what has been written on the Jer-Falcon in our systematic works, will convince the reader that in ornithology also the old saying is true, Doctors differ. No two authorities are quite agreed as to how many species of the great falcon of the Arctic regions ought to be recognised. The Jer-Falcons from various countries differ greatly from each other, yet for the most part they intergrade perfectly; and the discussions of the savants, after all, only prove that such things as species do not really exist in nature, but are artificial groups, adopted for our own convenience, or in deference to the opinion of our predecessors. The Jer-Falcons inhabit the Arctic and Sub-Arctic regions. They are true Falcons, possessing the pointed wing and toothed bill of this genus, of which they are the largest representatives. A length of from 20 to 24 inches distinguishes them from...
