Excerpt: ...mustaches, flesh, fat, sinews, and intestines, which they make up into as many necessary garments, dishes, etc. They have abundant reason to treasure its skin highly, for it is the covering to their neat bidarkies and bidarrahs, the former being the small kyak of Bering Sea, while the latter is a boat of all work, exploration, and transportation. These skins are unhaired by sweating in a pile: then they are deftly sewed and carefully stretched while green, over a light keel and frame of wood, making a perfectly water-tight boat that will stand, uninjured, the softening influence of water for a day or two at a time, if properly air dried and oiled. After being used during the day these skin boats are always drawn out on the beach, turned bottomside up, and air The store at St. Paul, as well as that at St. George, has its regular annual opening after the arrival of the steamer in the spring, to which the natives seem to pay absorbed attention. They crowd the buildings day and night, eagerly looking for all the novelties in food and apparel. These slouchy men and shawl-hooded women who pack the area before the counters here, seem to feel as deep an interest in the process of shopping as the most enthusiastic votaries of that business do in our own streets. It certainly seems to give them the greatest satisfaction of their lives on the Pribilov Islands. dried during the night. In this way they are made ready for employment again on the morrow. A peculiar value is attached to the intestines of the sea lion, which, after cleansing, are distended with air and allowed to dry in that shape. Then they are cut into ribbons and sewed strongly together into that most characteristic water-proof garment of the
