Not illustrated. 1862 Excerpt: ... which it would seem that nature has especially contrived to exclude the possibility of fertilization by other than own-flower stamens. It is true that the anthers in the closed flowers of Viola and Oxalis are stated never to have been found open, but in the Campanula observed by us the pollen evidently had access to the stigma; and indeed, M. Michalet points out, as we have said, the existence of fine threads connecting the anthers with the stigmas in the hermetically closed flowers of Oxalis. These fine threads, there can be no doubt, are the pollen-tubes. It is impossible that we should here enter upon the role of these remarkable flowers in the economy of the species to which they belong. We do not possess, as wo ly Baid, a sufficient basis of facts to work upon. It must suffice to suggest conjecturally that a conservative agency, if we may so term it, is at work in the vegetable kingdom, over and above the inherent check of a like tendency possessed in a high degree by the great majority of species, which absolutely prevents miscellaneous or wide hybridization or crossing. We do not forget that the question of hybridization of distinct species may be entered upon, to a certain extent, apart from that of the crossing of different individuals of the same species, and that a most important distinction may be drawn between them, but facts fail to show how far the check which prevents a crossing of species operates in preventing too wide a crossing of individuals of any one species, if indeed it operate in the latter case at all We have alluded to what have seemed to be special contrivances in certain flowers to prevent self-fertilization. Several familiar cases might be quoted but we have already exceeded a reasonable limit, and until so...
