Not illustrated. 1867 Excerpt: ...the Middle and Upper Devonian of Europe. I have heretofore given some of the varieties of this species under distinctive names, which have been abandoned after the study of larger collections. I have also been able to satisfy myself with regard to the identity of our species with those given by Sowerby and Phillips under different designations, and have adopted the synonymy given by Davidson, De Koninck, De Verneuil, Sowerby and others, under this species. It has a wide geographical extent and great vertical range in the Chemung group, and presents a variety of form and proportions which it would be quite impossible fully to illustrate. The more important phases I have endeavored to show in the figures on Plates Xli and Xlii: the greater number of these are of casts. Specimens received from Mr. O. St. John, of Waterloo, Iowa, in the Geological Report of the Fourth District of New-York, pp. 270, 271. The predominating characters of the casts of ventral valves are shown in 1-4 and 7, 8, 10, 13, 19 & 20 of Plate Xli. In figure 5 we have a form where the dental lamellae are extremely extended towards the front of the shell, and fig. 15 is somewhat similar. This extreme character has been observed more frequently in the small gibbous forms, but it likewise occurs in the large and less convex ones. The extremely extended forms with mucronate extremities are less common than the others; but in some localities, nearly all the individuals found have that character. The form represented by figures 19 and 20 of Plate Xli, and by figure 19 of Plate Xlii, is that described by Mr. Conrad as Delthyris perlatm, and is cited by Mr. Vanuxemj as Delthyris prolala. The Delthyris chemungensis of

Conrad is thus described: Delthyris
