Not illustrated. 1844 Excerpt: ...the thorax to the summit of the abdomen, like a loose garment. What a beautiful example of Divine foresight in creation! July 14.--In a corner of a closet stood a little phial, about an inch and a half high, which had held ink, but it had dried up. Looking at it this morning, I was surprised to find it closed with a white dry substance like pipeclay; and on breaking this was still more surprised to find the clew of the mystery. It held no less than eighteen spiders, of a few of which, however, the abdomen was wanting. The case was clear. A dauber, to save herself the labour of building a cell, had found and made use of this substitute: a very curious instance of insect laziness. July 21.--I perceive that the dauber has returned to the phial, and having, no doubt, observed that it had been handled, has taken out every one of the spiders, which she has strewn around, and having filled the bottle with newly caught spiders, has again sealed it up with mud. I think we may infer from this, that the parent exercises a measure of watchful guardianship over her young, sealed as they are from her sight and direct interference. Aug. 18.--About this time the other species of Pelopaeus began to be busy fabricating their more artful thimble-shaped nests. It is difficult to convey by words an idea of their mode of working; their general proceedings were as before, as respects bringing the mud &c. The commencement of a cell was by laying down the load, and working it into an oval ridge, one extremity of which was to be the apex of the thimble-cell. The next load was laid on the ridge, but so as to be higher at the apex than at any other part, and made slightly concave; when the tip was made, the work proceeded regularly by additions to the edges, which were smoothly la...
