Excerpt: ... 2. What species of Trochilium or its allies bore, in the larval state, the birch, willow and ash? 3. To rear from the egg or larva any of our common Lampyrides. February 7, 1872. The President in the chair. Thirty-two persons present. The following paper was read:--Description Of The Whale (balenoptera Museums) That Came Ashore In Boston Harbor, Nov. 25,1871. By Thomas Dwight, Jr., M. D. Although nothing specially new is to be learned from the gross appearances of this whale, yet they are worthy of note, for it is by the description of every specimen that can be examined that the obscurity may be removed which now confuses the classification of the Finners. I first saw the carcass on November 27th, two days after it had drifted ashore dead, at Point Shirley, and I visited it on several subsequent occasions. Excepting in the tongue, which had the appearance of a green feather-bed, there was but little decomposition; the abdomen, however, was somewhat inflated, and in places the epidermis was beginning to peel off. It is never easy to measure a whale accurately, and as in this case I went alone and with only a short tape measure, many of the results are open to doubt. I was unable to take the girth at any point, and on account of the position of the animal some measurements were in part by estimate; they are, however, I think, pretty accurate. The length is the one concerning which I am most in doubt, but I believe that a straight line from, the snout to the fork of the tail approached, but did not exceed, 65 feet. The expanse of the flukes was about 16 feet. ft. in. From the tip of the lower jaw to the front of the blow holes.... 10 10 To the insertion of the fore limb
