Not illustrated. 1896 Excerpt: ...limbs are never chelate, although the two pairs in front of them are frequently so. The tribe is divided into three sections. The first of these, or Crangoninea, contains the family Crangonidce, or shrimps, characterised by having the first pair of trunk-limbs subchelate, that is, with the terminal segment family, Sergestidce, in which the gills are impoverished or lost, while the first pair of trunk-legs and sometimes the second are simple, the chelae of the third are minute, and the fourth and fifth pairs are feeble, rudimentary, or absent. To this family belongs the genus Leucifer, remarkable for having the eyes and I antenna; supported at the end of a long neck which extends in advance of the mouth. The gills are absent, respiration being effected by means of the general integument, which is so thin that the internal organs can b3 seen. In the figure the dark line (?i) is the ventral t.nerve-chord which throws out finer branches from ganglionic swellings in each of the segments; (h) is the heart, while immediately below the latter is the stomach, passing forwards into the gullet and backwards into the intestine. Cleft-footed Group,--Order Schizopoda. This name is applied to a group nearly allied to the long-tailed Decapods; the chief difference between them being in the fact that in the present order the eight thoracic limbs are similar in structure, each being pediform and provided with a distinct exopodite on the second segment. The gills, which are attached either to the thoracic or abdominal appendages, generally project into the water, and are but rarely concealed in a chamber. The eggs are earned by the female beneath the trunk, and are frequently protected by the development of a pouch. The order contains several families embracing a large number...
